Career clues

To find your life purpose, ask yourself this one question: Think back, just what made you weird as a kid?

By Jessica Stillman | Inc.

DREAMSTIME

If you're struggling to decide on your next (or first) career move or worry that you haven't found your life purpose, some well-meaning soul will almost certainly ask you "What's your passion?"

Their intention is kind. But chasing your passion is actually a pretty horrendous approach to finding your professional purpose for several reasons.

One, if you had a passion strong enough to dedicate yourself to it professionally, you'd probably already know it. And in the likely case that you're unsure of what your passion is, some random person asking you about it will just make you feel more confused and inadequate.

Two, research out of Harvard shows that thinking your need to be passionate about your career actually reduces your resilience and makes you less likely to succeed. When you expect your job to be a constantly fulfilling passion project, you set yourself up for disappointment.

So if searching for your passion is a lousy way to find your life purpose, what's a better approach?

It turns out Bill Gates, Alphabet CEO Sundar Pichai and author Dan Pink all have the same unexpected suggestion.

'What made you weird as a kid?'

In a recent YouTube video, Pink, the author of bestsellers like "Drive" and "When," reports that research out of the Harvard Graduate School of Education shows 60% of young people say their lives lack purpose. To help out lost searchers (young and old), Pink suggests a series of questions to help identify your life purpose.

Many of them are interesting. But one in particular reminded me of wisdom I had heard from other high achievers. Pink suggests asking yourself: "What made me weird as a kid?"

Your odd habits and strange interests as a child are probably not the first place your mind goes when searching for purpose as an adult.

"As kids we gravitate towards the things we love. We don't worry too much about if they're cool or normal," he says. "And those early fascinations can be important indicators of what drives us."

If you made bracelets for hours on end as a kid, then something deep inside you probably really loves beauty and working with your hands. If you played in the woods all day, your enthusiasm for nature runs deep.

You weren't doing these things to impress anyone or because your mom or your teacher made you. What you freely did as a kid is what you would do if status and practicality weren't issues.

Identifying and following these inner motivations tends to give our careers, and our lives, a feeling of purpose.

A couple of billionaires agree

When Gates was speaking to Harvard students a few years back, one young person who was still undecided about his career path asked the Microsoft founder for advice on finding a job where he'd shine.

"The thing that you're likely to be world-class at is whatever you obsessed over from age 12 to 18. In my case, it was writing software," Gates reportedly told the audience. His age window is slightly older than Pink, but the underlying wisdom is the same.

Don't count cash out of the mix of today's spending

Terry Savage

There's a lot of paper money circulating out there, despite the movement toward digital transactions. The current total value of U.S. currency in circulation is $2.4 trillion, as of July. That includes all physical paper bills and coins circulating globally.

You may have noticed in your own daily life that you tend to use less cash in your transactions. It's easier to use a card — either credit or debit — for most purchases. And some places don't even accept cash.

Now, with the new tax-free status of tips, you'll find even less use for cash. The barber, manicurist or waiter doesn't benefit from not declaring tips in cash.

Still, many businesses do offer a discount for cash to avoid paying interchange fees on credit cards. But even that cash request is often fulfilled using Zelle, an ACH bank-to-bank transfer or a debit card.

Now that online banks such as Discover and Capital One can offer rewards for debit usage, either points or cash back, the use of plastic has become more widespread.

In short, who needs paper money anymore if you lead a legitimate financial life and are not part of a drug ring or other underground activity?

Cash is not dead

Surprisingly, the latest survey from the Federal Reserve — the 2025 Diary of Consumer Payment Choice — shows cash as the third most-popular transaction medium, after credit and debit cards.

In 2024, consumers made an average of 48 payments a month, up two payments compared to 2023. And while the number of payments is growing, the majority of payments were "remote" — not at the point of sale — revealing the impact of online transactions. And most were made digitally. A total of 45% of remote payments were conducted using a mobile phone, followed by computers at 25%, according to the report.

Cash was used for only 14% of all payments — and the dollar volume per cash transaction tends to come from "small-value" payments of under $25.

You likely won't be surprised that lower-income families tend to use more cash. The report says people in households earning less than $25,000 a year used cash for 24% of payments. They are more than twice as likely to use cash as people in households earning more than $100,000.

Adults 55 and older used cash for 19% of payments, nine percentage points higher than those ages 25 to 54.

That doesn't mean cash is going away. The Fed's report shows nearly 80% of consumers held cash in their pockets, purses or wallets at least one day during the reporting period, a finding that has been consistent since 2018. But the amount of cash held on person and available for spending declined to $67, an average of $7 less than in 2023.
